

Speaking and Facilitation: Tips & Tricks

Part 1: Creating your session plan

Preparing your session

Create your session plan

You want to create a session that is participatory, so that you can co-design solutions and outputs with others.

"Participatory" means that a workshop invites input. Instead of "presenting" information, the facilitator asks participants to help solve problems.

Using participatory practices leads to better solutions, more inspiration and more collaboration. Creation isn't passive, and "participatory" does not mean formless.

Welcoming people

Question: How do you want people to feel in your session?

Future: Say what you're going to do

Encouraging participation

No one wants to waste their time on things that don't directly impact them or their work.

Question: What outputs do you want and why do these outputs matter to others?

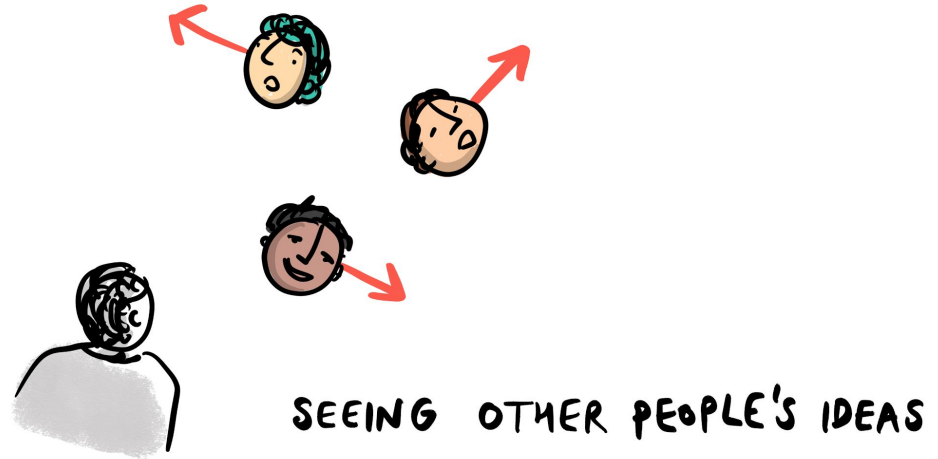

Future: Say what you're going to do

Disabling power dynamics

Productive collaboration is only possible when people feel safe and that their contribution is valued.

Question: How can you ensure that everyone is able to contribute equally?

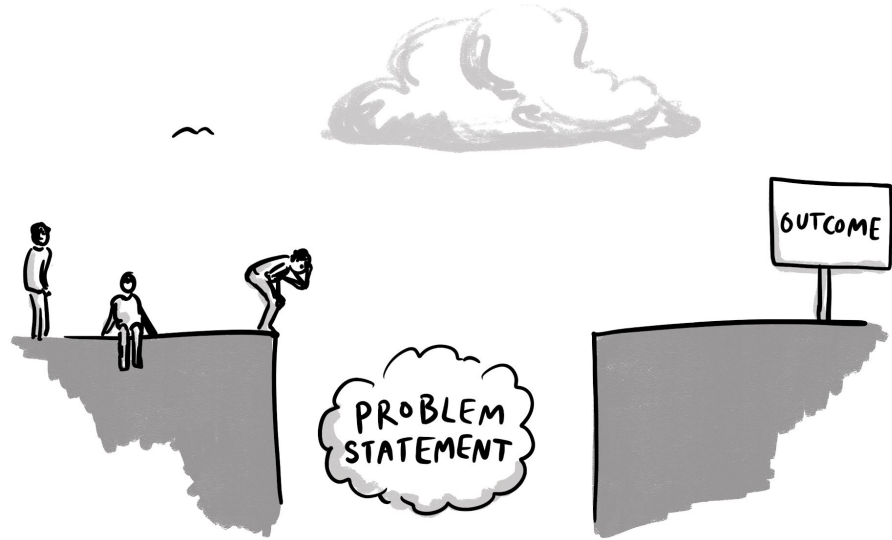

Present: Do what you're going to do

Provide input

A good prompt will give people something to respond to. Use your introduction to ask challenging questions.

Question: How can you use your presentation or introduction to get people thinking?

Present: Do what you're going to do

Help people collaborate

Small groups of people are less intimidating and often lead to more lively discussions. Aim for groups of 3 or 5.

Question: What can people DO that will help you move your work forward?

CONFIDENCE

Present: Do what you're going to do

Gather outputs

People are always happy to use their hands at real life events. Encourage expressive participation with drawing or mindmapping activities.

Question: What instructions can you give that guide the conversations and help your participants produce valuable insights?

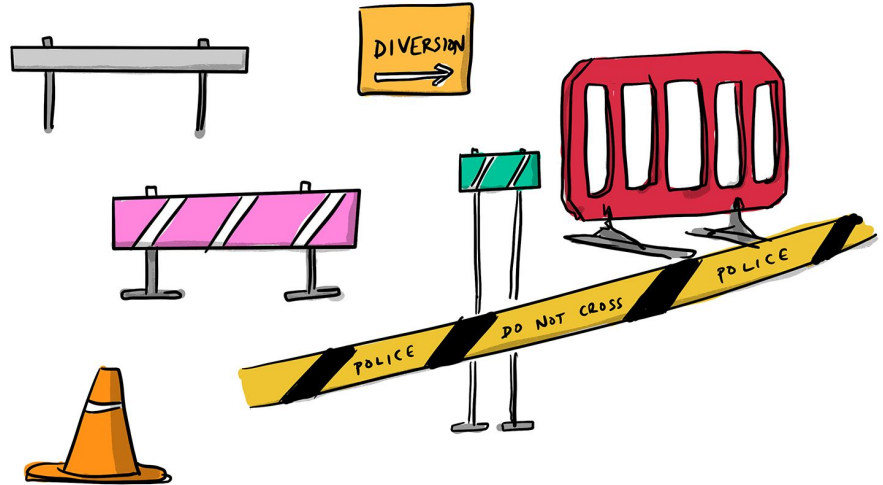

Past: Say what you did

Debriefing on the main activity

Asking people to summarize their discussion and outputs for the full group helps others gain an understanding of conversations they were not a part of.

Question: How can you time-box share outs so that each group gets a chance to share?

Past: Say what you did

Closing circles

Asking people to emotionally reflect on their session experience solidifies the session and helps you learn what is important for people moving forward.

Question: How will you model this reflective activity for your participants?

Past: Say what you did

Finish with a call to action

Your session should be the beginning of collaboration. As you build connections and trust, you should tell people what you want to achieve in the medium/long term.

Question: What can people do to stay involved with you and your work?

WHAT DO YOU
NOT WANT TO HAPPEN NEXT?
